Grey-crowned Babbler project update 2014

With the recent, generous donation from Alcoa and BirdLife Melbourne to assist Friends of the Grey-crowned Babbler with their conservation efforts, it is timely to reflect on what has been achieved with regards to this species' conservation in Victoria and what remains to be done

It is now more than twenty years since Birds Australia initiated its Grey-crowned Babbler (babbler) conservation project in Victoria, thanks to a one-year grant from the Australian Government's National Estate funding program. It is also twenty years since Birds Australia and other community organisations first applied for funding to do on-ground works to assist with the babblers' survival. So how is this charismatic and sociable bird faring?

Population trends

Overall, the babbler population in Victoria has declined by at least 90% over the past 150 years and has disappeared from more than 50% of its former range, so the species is still at a high risk of extinction. Collectively it is estimated that there are about 500-600 family groups persisting in Victoria, with key strongholds located around Violet Town, Euroa, Benalla, Rutherglen, Barmah, Boort and Kerang. Even in these stronghold districts, though, there is a general downwards trend in total numbers and the size of each family group. During the lifetime of this project, moreover, family groups or populations have disappeared from some well-known former parts of their range, including the Mornington Peninsula, Maryborough, Castlemaine, Kiata, Nagambie and Rupanyup.

Importantly, however, in those districts where community groups and conservation agencies have focused their conservation efforts, there have generally been positive responses in terms of population size and breeding success. We know, therefore, that it is possible to help babblers – it is just a matter of having the resources and the time to do it.

The major cause of the babbler's decline in Victoria has been the loss of their preferred woodland habitat. Over the past 150 years these woodlands have been largely cleared for agriculture, mining, urban development and firewood collection. As a consequence, babbler populations have shrunk in size and become isolated from each other. The number of birds in each family group has also declined, because smaller populations produce fewer young. For this highly social species, therefore, habitat fragmentation has caused major social disruption.

community groups have focused their efforts on three main conservation actions:

- increase the total amount of habitat available for babblers in priority areas by encouraging the protection and restoration of habitat on private and public land
- increase the quality and availability of habitat at known babbler sites to increase group size and breeding success, and
- increase the connectivity between isolated groups or patches of habitat. This creates more opportunities for birds to disperse and colonise.

Achievements to date

One of the stand-out demonstrations of the success of this approach to the babbler's conservation has been in the Lurg district, northeast of Benalla. Here, the local landcare group, Regent Honeyeater Project group, BirdLife Australia and many other groups and individuals have steadily protected and restored habitat and habitat corridors since the early 1990s. When monitoring of babbler numbers began in 2001, the babbler population here was estimated to comprise 13 groups and 53 birds. Now the population has increased to 21 groups and 106 birds, with average family size increasing from four birds to five. In the Euroa-Violet Town districts, where Friends of the Grey-crowned Babbler have targeted most of their on-ground conservation efforts, the responses by babblers to more, improved habitat has not been as dramatic as at Lurg but nonetheless positive.

Vale Norman Eyre-Walker

Many members of BirdLife Australia, and particularly those of BirdLife Melbourne's Weekdays Outings group, will be saddened by the death of Norman Eyre-Walker on 27 December 2013 following many months of deteriorating health.

Norman was a stalwart of what we now know as BirdLife Australia, joining the then Bird Observers Club after his retirement. He enjoyed both the monthly meetings and the Weekdays Outings, of which he acted as co-convenor for several years. He led many outings for the group and his meticulous research and knowledge of the chosen area and its birds was always a highlight.

He carried his birding knowledge and enthusiasm into several areas of his life, especially enjoying private trips with experts like John Barkla and the late Fred TH Smith. Another great friend and birding mentor has been Graeme Hosken.

Together with his wife Bonnie, a knowledgeable plantswoman and a keen-eyed birder, Norman relished life at their holiday home at Kennett River and the two explored most of the Otway Ranges as well as much of Australia.

He was always a low-key birder and even when his personal bird-list was well past a total aspired to by many, he took as much pleasure in showing newcomers the brilliance of an Eastern Rosella in bright sunshine or an Eastern Yellow Robin perching quietly on a tree trunk as he did in adding something new to his own list.

In 2009, researchers from The University of Melbourne and Trust for Nature found that babbler groups were more likely to have persisted at sites where there had been habitat works, breeding success was higher at sites with additional habitat and the number of young raised per family at sites with additional habitat was nearly double that of babbler families at sites with no additional habitat. Based on these findings, Friends of the Grey-crowned Babbler continue to implement or support the implementation of their key conservation actions for babblers across these districts. Since the project began, twenty years ago, the Friends group, working with local landcare groups, conservation agencies and Trust for Nature has protected and restored more than 2,000 ha of habitat through the Euroa-Violet Town districts.

The Group's conservation mantra is plan big, based on good science, and then try to save the species one family at a time. The recent grant from BirdLife Melbourne will help support the group continue with delivering these aims and the Friends group gratefully acknowledges the support of BirdLife Melbourne and Alcoa for its work.

Acknowledgement of Alcoa of Australia's contribution to BirdLife Melbourne

In appreciation of Rob Ganly's efforts in carrying out recent surveys at Alcoa's Point Henry site, Alcoa of Australia has made another generous contribution of $1,000 to BirdLife Melbourne. BirdLife Melbourne Committee thanks Alcoa of Australia for making this valuable contribution which is greatly appreciated and also thanks Rob for his dedicated field work. In keeping with tradition of donating the money to a worthy conservation project, this year's contribution has been forwarded to the Regent Honeyeater Project.
